Mr. Sargent conducted a meat and grocery store for Mr. Walker Stathens, located under the Commonwealth office. He was an attenthe Commonwealth office. He was an attentive, industrious, and sober business man, cheerful in his demeanor and respected by those who knew him. Some two months ago a small dug followed him from the street into his store, and seemed to recognize him virtually as its master. This dog he gave to a compositor in the Commonwealth office, by whom it was kept for some days. It was quite small, hardly over six inches in height. It was afflicted with some skin disease, and at times appeared to be laboring under a species of st. Maggeting backwards, and yelping as if with pain. It was not supplied as if with pain. It was not supplied to rubies. Mr. Sargent one day fed it with a small piece of meat, which it had no sooner swallowed, than it caught his hand at the base of the thumb, pieceing the fisch with its small, keen teeth. He shook it off, paying so other attention to the wound, which rapidly healed. The dog died, a few days after, in our composing room.

On Saturday avening last Mr. Sargent felt pain in his hand, in the vicinity of the old wound. The pain gradually extended to the lingers and crept up the arm into the body. The arm and hand became numb, incapasitating him from his usual use of those members. The numbness and vervousness increasing, he ammuned a physician, who, after a vary careful examination, could

The intervention of nervous spasms, accompanied with the most harrowing symptoms, gave to his disease a frightful cast. By accident, on the presentation of water to allay his thirst, the true character of his malady was developed in the agonizing apasms that immediately wracked and tortured his physical frame. He could not endure the sight even of sensor, or its median. His spanne were brief in duration, but of the most furful character, causing his eyes to dilette and his whole appearance to assume a character so frightful that it baffles all description. character so frightful that it baffles all description. The slightest impact upon his hody caused convulsions, his nervous organism being wronght up to its highest tenaron. The strength of several persons was necessary to hold him in position during his spasma. He did not seek to infict hurm on any one, but was entirely conscious up to the hour of his doath, giving instructions concerning his business, and delivating partiage measures to his family and friends.

During Sueday he was "sited by many citizens and the physicians, who offered "all the aid possible for his relief. He awallow red only a few pills by great effort on Sw aday oly a few pills by great effort on Sw oda
